This work would not have been possible without the friendly and patient participation of citizens of the United States, England, and France. They gave of their time, their hospitality and their insight. I apologize to them for any statements that reveal any lack of understanding on my part.

I am also very grateful to two national funding organizations that generously supported my research and made possible a project that might otherwise have been financially impossible. I thank the British Commonwealth Association of Universities Fellowship Committee for their award (1998-2002) and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada for their fellowships (1998 to 2004).

Many people contributed to the preparation of this work by offering insights and advice. Principal amongst these was Dr. William Outhwaite of the University of Sussex. His extensive knowledge of social theory and political thought gave me the courage to undertake this ambitious project...and his many patient readings of the manuscript helped reassure me that I was not losing my wits. I also thank Dr. Steve Burman, head of American Studies and Humanities at Sussex University, who helped me clarify certain points regarding American history and culture. Last, but certainly not least, I owe gratitude to Dr. Anthony Synnott who accompanied me during the final preparation of a later version of the manuscript and who kindly arranged for a pleasant and productive stay at Concordia University in Montreal, Canada (2002-2004) subsequent to the time I spent at the University of Sussex. As for my colleagues at the University of Prince Edward Island, a university placed in one of the most civil regions in North America, I thank Dr. Richard Kurial, Dean of Arts, President Wade MacLauchlan, and Professor Joe Kopachevsky for their encouragement and support.

I also owe fond gratitude to colleagues who have encouraged me to pursue my sociological themes. They include Dr. John Drysdale, Dr. Susan Hoecker-Drysdale, Dr. Peter Wagner, Dr. Caroline Knowles, Dr. William Reimer, Dr. Veret-Amit, Dr. Frederick Lowy, Dr. Henry Lustiger-Thaller and the late Mordecai Richler.

Finally, I am grateful to publishers who have granted permission for the citing of text. Particularly, thanks are owed to Blackwell Publishers for excerpts from the works of Norbert Elias and the Public Broadcasting Service's NOW programme for the transcript of its interview with Paul Woodruff.
